Left: The greenish tint in this photo is a drastic example of a very common problem caused by many digital cameras.

Right: A little adjustment of the Tint slider clears it up in a jiffy. It's not always as obvious as it is here that you need a tint adjustment. If you aren't sure, the sky is often a dead giveaway. Is it robin's egg blue? Is the photo's sky that color and the real sky was just plain blue, tint is what you need.

Sharpening

Now that you've finished your other corrections, it's time to sharpen your photo. Sharpening gives the effect of better focus by improving the edge contrast in your photo. Most digital camera photos need some sharpening because the sharpening your camera applies is usually deliberately conservative. Once again, a Quick Fix Auto button is at your service. Give the Auto Sharpen button (located in the Sharpen palette) a try to get things started. Figure 4-11 shows what you can expect.

Middle: What you get by clicking the Auto Sharpen button.

Right: The results of using the Sharpen slider to achieve stronger sharpening than Auto was initially willing to perform.

The sad truth is that there really isn't any way to actually improve the focus of a photo once it's taken. Software sharpening just increases the contrast where the program perceives edges, so using it first can have strange effects on other editing tools and their ability to understand your photo.
