Dear Sir,

I refer to the article by Ben Macintyre's article (08 November 2013, "Russia's art theft still violates civilized values") and would like to inform you that Germany is not the only country still suffering from Russian historical theft.

Tsarist Russia invaded Poland numerous times, and, in 1793 (2nd Partition of Poland) the Russians took the entire collection of 420,000 books and manuscripts, including 24 paintings of Warsaw by Canaletto, as well as 18,000 gold and silver coins from the Zaluski Library in Warsaw – the 4th largest European Library at the time - and created the St. Petersburg Imperial Public Library based on the stolen books from Warsaw.

After the Polish uprising in 1832, the universities of Warsaw and Vilnius were closed down by the Russians and their libraries were also taken away and sent to the Hermitage Museum. In addition, the main Polish Science Library of Plock was closed in 1898 and all 13,000 science books were taken away by the Russians.

The Soviets agreed to return some 47,000 books and 14,000 manuscripts between 1921 and 1934, but only books written in Polish. The Hermitage Museum Library (today the National Library of Russia) still refuses to return the remaining books and manuscripts (approximately 350,000, many in Latin and French) stolen more than 200 years ago.

With Best Regards
