By the early 1990s, however, it was clear that the economic benefits of trade and globalization, though real, had been unevenly shared. There had been problems, notably the collapse in value of the Latin American debt, and a growing loss of faith in the capacity of governments to do the things necessary to attract investment and promote growth. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund had begun to press for a new kind of economic orthodoxy, one that placed the primacy of the market in economic policy-making. It was the beginning of the "Washington Consensus," the set of principles that the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund had agreed to promote in the wake of the Asian financial crisis of 1997-1998.
