

Mechanical Working in Plastic Polymers

Background:

Amorphous polymers are known to have a low modulus modulus giving through them a low range from about the range of a steel wire. However, they are known to have a high strength range from about 100 to 1000 MPa. This is due to the fact that the polymer chains are held together by a network of intermolecular forces (hydrogen bonds, van der Waals forces, etc.) which are not as strong as the covalent bonds in a metal. The strength of these forces is determined by the nature of the polymer. For example, polyethylene has a low strength (about 100 MPa) while polystyrene has a higher strength (about 500 MPa). The strength of these forces is also affected by the temperature. As the temperature increases, the strength of the forces decreases, and the polymer becomes more plastic. This is why polymers are used in a wide range of applications, from low-strength plastics to high-strength fibers. The mechanical properties of polymers are also affected by the processing conditions. For example, the strength of a polymer can be increased by drawing or stretching it. This is because the drawing process aligns the polymer chains, which increases the strength of the intermolecular forces. The mechanical properties of polymers are also affected by the presence of additives. For example, the addition of fillers can increase the strength and modulus of a polymer. The addition of plasticizers can decrease the strength and modulus of a polymer. The mechanical properties of polymers are also affected by the aging process. As a polymer ages, it can become more brittle and its strength can decrease.

Objectives:

1. To study the mechanical properties of polymers.
2. To study the effect of processing conditions on the mechanical properties of polymers.

Materials:

- 1. Polystyrene
- 2. Polyethylene
- 3. Polypropylene

Procedure:

1. The specimens are prepared in the form of tensile bars. The tensile bars are prepared by drawing or stretching the polymer. This process aligns the polymer chains, which increases the strength of the intermolecular forces. The tensile bars are then tested in a tensile testing machine. The tensile testing machine measures the force required to stretch the tensile bar. The force is measured in Newtons (N). The displacement of the tensile bar is measured in millimeters (mm). The tensile strength of the polymer is calculated as the force divided by the cross-sectional area of the tensile bar. The tensile strength is measured in MPa.
2. The effect of processing conditions on the mechanical properties of polymers is studied. The processing conditions studied are drawing, stretching, and aging. The mechanical properties of the polymers are measured before and after each processing condition. The mechanical properties measured are tensile strength, modulus, and elongation at break.
