Introduction

Light is a part of a continuous spectrum, or energy source. Shorter wavelengths of energy have greater amounts of energy. For example, high energy ultraviolet rays, with wavelengths of approximately 1 nanometer (nm) to 400 nm, can burn living tissues that no other light source can. Shorter energy, wavelengths of light include the visible part of the light spectrum (400 nm to 700 nm) and the infrared (IR) part of the spectrum (700 nm to 1,000,000 nm). Long visible light, with the longest wavelength, has enough energy to cause chemical changes without destroying biological molecules. The short, high frequency ultraviolet part of the spectrum (100 nm) has the most energy and breaks down biological bonds (even protein biological molecules such as amino acid and nucleic acids, like DNA). The longer waves of most electromagnetic wavelengths (400 nm to 1,000,000 nm) do not provide enough energy and are absorbed by other water molecules in a plant.

When light is absorbed by leaf pigments such as chlorophyll a or b, absorbed visible light (photosynthesis) can be used for photosynthetic energy. This energy is used to produce ATP, the molecule that the mitochondria use to produce energy. Photosynthesis produces oxygen molecules as a byproduct called carbon dioxide that plants take in.

Plants that are exposed and cultivated with a medium that contains plenty of the leaf disk, sometimes use the disk. These leaf disk cultures produce a small amount of oxygen (photosynthesis) that is enough to keep the leaf disk alive. The leaf disk culture can be used for photosynthesis. In photosynthesis, plants, exposed to sufficient light, release water for the leaf disk culture. Changes (photosynthesis) during the disk culture. After a while, oxygen is produced in the culture as the water leaves the leaf. The disk, containing the oxygen generated by photosynthesis, then rises above the water when it is in a medium containing an indicator that all photosynthesis has ended. The disk, now containing the ATP from all photosynthesis for several hours, can be used for many other experiments.
