

Learning Objectives Define what birth, death, and life expectancy are. Give examples of how these factors are used to describe growth rates. Explain what the birth rate, death rate, and growth rate are.

Types of Population Growth		Factors	Effects
Exponential Growth		An increase in population with no technological, environmental, or social constraints
Logistic Growth	Phase 1	An increase in population with no technological, environmental, or social constraints
	Phase 2	Resource limitation
	Phase 3	No technological, environmental, or social constraints

Lesson Summary

Describing Populations

Birth rate is the number of children in a population. Death rate is the number of deaths in a population. Life expectancy is the average number of years a person is expected to live.

Change after 10 years is the change in population size over a 10-year period. It is calculated by subtracting the population size in 1990 from the population size in 2000. The result is the change in population size over a 10-year period.
