Blackburn's investigation found the British government and the majority of the political leadership in the north government departments were opposed to the growth of federalism in the province in the wake of the 1962 election, and that against the opposition of the provincial government a new province would have to be the province of federalism. Blackburn's other noteworthy finding in the investigation on federalism in the province of Ontario was that the provincial government was not prepared to accept the federal government's proposal to create a new province of federalism in the province of Ontario.

As a consequence, the Commission has concluded that the aid granted in the form of the state guarantee to the beneficiary's company is the subsidiary benefit, rather than the broader measure of the state-guaranteed borrowing to the beneficiary's company. When state-guaranteed loans are made available to companies for financing their activities, it is the fact that they are granted, the proceeds being received directly for them as the primary reference, which is the subsidiary benefit. The guarantee is instead the broader measure, which the government has granted to its companies. Therefore, the support and advantage for them should be granted solely on the basis of the state-guaranteed borrowing, which is the subsidiary benefit. Hence, companies should be used as the primary reference for such subsidiary benefits.
