Resonance has played a role in the development of the human voice, but there is no evidence that it is a necessary part of speech. The human voice is produced by the vocal cords, which vibrate and create sound waves. These waves travel through the vocal tract, which includes the pharynx, oral cavity, and nasal cavity. The shape of the vocal tract determines the pitch and timbre of the voice. Resonance occurs when the sound waves are amplified by the vocal tract, but it is not essential for speech. The human voice is a complex system, and its development has been shaped by a variety of factors, including genetics, environment, and learning.
