Therapeutic Relationship With Patients

This piece of reflection will focus on my experiences whilst on practice placement; I will be using the (Gibbs 1988, cited in Jasper 2003, p.77) model of reflection. Gibbs cycle is set out in order of categories made up of different headings. (See appendix 1). By using this cycle it allows me to reflect in structured and effective way. The subject of this final piece of reflection will cover the development and utilisation of interpersonal skills in order to establish and maintain therapeutic relationships.

Neal (2003, p100) states a therapeutic relationship can be described as being between nurse and patient and is based on patients needs for care assistance and guidance. It is a relationship that is established solely to meet the patient's needs and therefore, is therapeutic in nature.

Chambers et al (2005, p303) suggest interpersonal and therapeutic relationships are at the centre of nursing work, the relationship that exists between nurse and patient can often provide the energy and be the catalyst, the motivation and the source of strength to continue with treatment or face difficult sometimes life threatening situations.

I felt the need to develop therapeutic relationships with the patient's so that they could feel they could put their trust in me, also that I was there to listen and talk to them not just care for them. There is also a need of good interpersonal skills when forming a therapeutic relationship. Cutcliff (2005, p57) states that you can gain comfort from drawing on your interpersonal skills are having strength and endurance, feeling self confident and brave, having sufficient competence, feeling independent, being at peace and ease with oneself and also having a sense of being valued and useful.

My final placement was an elderly rehabilitation ward which help the patient's to adapt to changes in their life circumstances. The ultimate goal is to maximise the social well being of the individual and enabling them to regain their maximum quality of life and the rehabilitation involved all the individuals' daily activities. I was not sure what to expect from this placement as it was my first experience of working on an elderly rehabilitation ward, as my first placement before was on a surgical ward. During my first days on the ward I found it very different as the patients needed more assistance with their activities of living, such as mobility when transferring and their hygiene needs.

However the ward did use the same model of care on the ward as my last placement which was the Roper, Logan and Tierney activities of living model. This helped as the purpose of this model of nursing is to provide a framework mainly for nurses to plan and individualize nursing for those interventions which are related to the patient's activities of daily living. Roper et al (2002, p434) states that living could be described as an amalgam within the activities of daily living and the way in which the activities are carried out by each person contributes to individuality in living.

In both of these placements I have interacted with a large number of patients, all of whom have been admitted for a variety of difference reasons. This involves me admitting these patients, their overall care during their time either in hospital or in other care centres right up to their discharge.
