

Chapter 14 Study Guide

- Plant growth and development: These processes, including morphological changes, must go along with changes in the growth.
- Health of vascular tissue: water-conducting xylem and nutrient-conducting phloem. The air content of the xylem is critical.
- Plant's chemical ecology: Plant when under stress releases its chemical compounds to signal to its neighbors. A chemical signal can be released that may lead to defense reactions leading to the production of compounds and structural proteins that are protective for the organism itself.
- Plant's environmental interactions: Plants in their study have to fight against both abiotic and biotic environmental stresses. Growth of plants under stress is reduced to some extent but they may not be able to survive.
- Climate: Primary environmental stress: Temperature, wind, light, water availability, salinity, air pollution, drought, heavy metal pollution, etc. are important environmental factors. Growth of plants is reduced to some extent but they may not be able to survive.
- Soil: Plant's environment: Soil is the source of water and nutrients for the plant.
- Environmental factors of growth: Temperature, water and light are the most important factors. Growth of plants is reduced to some extent but they may not be able to survive.
- Environmental factors of growth: Temperature, water and light are the most important factors. Growth of plants is reduced to some extent but they may not be able to survive.
