Figure 9.10 (a) How the graph used in Figure 9.9(a) is searched using breadth-first search. (b) How the graph is searched using depth-first search.

...algorithm will be used to search the graph. We can think of a search tree as a directed graph where each node is a state of the world. The root node is the initial state. The edges of the graph are the actions that can be taken from one state to another. The search algorithm will find a path from the root node to a goal node. This is the approach used by depth-first search. Depth-first search is often used when the search space is very large and the goal is to find a single path. It is also used when the search space is very large and the goal is to find all paths. Breadth-first search is often used when the search space is very large and the goal is to find the shortest path. It is also used when the search space is very large and the goal is to find all paths.

9.4.1 Breadth-First Search of Graphs

Breadth-first search is a search algorithm that explores all the nodes of a graph level by level. It starts at the root node and explores all its children. Then it explores all the children of those children, and so on. It continues until it reaches a goal node or until all nodes have been explored. Breadth-first search is often used when the search space is very large and the goal is to find the shortest path. It is also used when the search space is very large and the goal is to find all paths.
