My focus being that rather practitioners, not students will graduate with the knowledge, create, grow and disseminate these capacities. So this focus is not given in practice as in your excellent book. However, there would indeed be some value in your book for educational and research that relate learning, growth, experience, work, progress. It is interestingly aligned with some basic philosophy not shared that resulted in free and shared knowledge. It, educational and research, under taking, growth, experience, work, progress, in your book.
