During childhood, people in the United Kingdom, like those in most other countries, are not as likely to be vaccinated as people in the United States. In the United Kingdom, the vaccination schedule for children is based on the National Immunisation Schedule, which is a list of diseases that are considered to be most likely to cause serious illness or death. The schedule is updated regularly, and the government provides free vaccinations for children. In the United States, the vaccination schedule is based on the Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices (ACIP) recommendations, which are based on the latest scientific evidence. The schedule is also updated regularly, and the government provides free vaccinations for children. In both countries, the vaccination schedule is designed to protect children from the most common and most serious infectious diseases. However, there are some differences between the two schedules. For example, the United Kingdom schedule includes a vaccine for whooping cough (diphtheria, tetanus, and pertussis) that is not included in the United States schedule. Conversely, the United States schedule includes a vaccine for measles, mumps, and rubella (MMR) that is not included in the United Kingdom schedule. These differences reflect the different disease patterns and public health policies of the two countries.

The most important findings were consistent for the 1990 and 1991 periods. Following a period of fluctuation in the number of cases in the United States, there was a steady increase in the number of cases reported, with the 1991 peak of 1,173 cases, though not statistically significant. This consistency across both years
