Health-care professionals' involvement in quality improvement (QI) programs requires specific skills and training. A QI program usually only flourishes if the people doing the improvement are trained and are offered the resources necessary to sustain their improvement efforts. Professionals need education in the general statistical techniques that are fundamental to QI. Some are not prepared to do this independently, however, and thus require being taught specific techniques. Others are concerned over whether the training will actually make differences and what their personal roles will be in the process and how.
