Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion slowly decreases. Molecules that are bonded remain close to each other and vibrate. In liquids, molecules are not so close together and they can move from one place to another. In gases, molecules are scattered throughout a container and they move fast. As the temperature decreases, the molecules move more slowly. At the freezing point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly. At the boiling point, the molecules are far apart and they move fast. At the melting point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly. At the condensing point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly. At the sublimating point, the molecules are far apart and they move fast. At the depositing point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly. At the evaporating point, the molecules are far apart and they move fast. At the melting point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly. At the condensing point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly. At the sublimating point, the molecules are far apart and they move fast. At the depositing point, the molecules are close together and they move slowly.
