Precambrian

The Precambrian is the time span from the formation of the Earth around 4.6 billion years ago to the beginning of the Cambrian period.

The Hadean Eon is named after the Greek god of the underworld because of the hellish conditions on Earth at that time -- our planet had just been formed, was still very hot, and frequently collided with other solar system bodies.

The Proterozoic Eon marked a profound change in life on Earth. Prior to it, most living organisms were small, simple, and unicellular.

The Cambrian Period was when complex life forms evolved and took their first breath of oxygen on dry land. It features the rise of fish, amphibians and reptiles.

The Paleozoic Era is also known as "the age of the dinosaurs" because it features the rise of reptiles and their conquest of the Earth's land, seas, and air.

The Cenozoic Era features the rise of mammals -- and more recently, humans in particular -- as the dominant class of animals on earth.
