Learning Objectives

Evolutionary use of the classification: The study of evolutionary relationships among organisms is called phylogeny. A classification based on evolutionary relationships is called phylogenetic systematics or evolutionary classification.

- 1. Evolutionary classification places organisms into higher taxa based on shared traits that should reflect a taxon number more than that for members of any other group. The larger the more, the higher rank is that all of members sharing common ancestor.
- 2. In the system, organisms are placed into groups called clades. A clade is a group of species that includes a single common ancestor and all descendants of that ancestor. It does not include anything else. group that include all species that are descended from a common ancestor, and descendants are species that are not descended from that common ancestor.

Cladogram: A cladogram is a diagram that shows how species or higher taxa are related to each other. A cladogram shows three evolutionary traits or changes, from the root to the terminal categories.

- 1. In a cladogram, the place where the vertical lineage splits is called a node, or a split. Nodes represent the point where two things that shared a common ancestor.
- 2. The bottom of the diagram is the root, represents the common ancestor of all the organisms in the cladogram.
- 3. Cladists usually refer to species, clades, or clades. A monophyletic is a root that leads to the most recent common ancestor of a particular clade and not joined or split the clade.

How to Construct a Cladogram: All organisms from DNA. Because DNA is a variable across all forms of life, the molecule can be compared to different species. In general, the more shared species/organisms are species share, the more closely the species share a common ancestor within each clade. (Note: shared traits are)
