When Phosphorus (P) and Sulfur (S) are available in adequate ratios to the soil, they can be used by plants to produce proteins and nucleic acids (Fig. 1a) (Pridmore 1999). However, in nutrient-poor soils, the availability of P and S is limited, and plants must develop strategies to acquire these nutrients (Fig. 1b) (Pridmore 1999). One such strategy is the formation of root nodules by symbiotic bacteria (Fig. 1c) (Pridmore 1999). These nodules are specialized structures that contain bacteria that fix atmospheric nitrogen (N) and provide the plant with a source of N. The plant provides the bacteria with carbohydrates and a protective environment (Pridmore 1999). This symbiotic relationship is essential for the growth and development of many plants, particularly in nutrient-poor soils (Pridmore 1999).

These findings have a number of implications for the design of the system. First, the system should be designed to be user-friendly and easy to use. Second, the system should be designed to be secure and reliable. Third, the system should be designed to be scalable and flexible. Fourth, the system should be designed to be cost-effective. Finally, the system should be designed to be user-centric and to meet the needs of the users.
