Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion slowly decreases. Molecules that are bonded remain close to each other and vibrate. Molecules that are not bonded move farther apart. They move a great deal less rapidly than the molecules in the liquid. Molecules separated completely a distance of 10 or 20 molecules apart find that the forces of the liquid are too weak to overcome them. At the same time, the few molecules near the new voids created find no attractive forces to pull them into the voids. The voids grow larger. The molecules that are separated find that the forces of the liquid are too weak to overcome them. The voids grow larger. The molecules that are separated find that the forces of the liquid are too weak to overcome them. The voids grow larger.
