Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion decreases and the particles "stick" together. The molecules forming these ice crystals are held together by hydrogen bonds, the same type of intermolecular forces that cause a gas to turn into a liquid. Cooling to the solidification point of the liquid forms a crystalline structure, a pattern of atoms or molecules that allows the particles to be tightly and orderly interconnected. At the solidification point, the two molecules on the sides only interact, and are not inter-connected, which is the case with polymers. The molecules are connected together only at the point of crystallization. In the solid crystalline structure, the molecules are connected side to side and end to end, and are not connected to each other.
