

Production of Supernumerary PGCs during Embryonic Development

The diagram illustrates the process of germ cell migration and the formation of the germ line. The germ cells migrate from the outer cell mass (OCM) to the inner cell mass (ICM) and then to the developing embryo. The germ cells that migrate to the ICM and then to the developing embryo are the ones that will eventually form the PGCs. The diagram shows the migration of germ cells from the OCM to the ICM and then to the developing embryo, where they eventually form the PGCs.

The diagram illustrates the process of fertilization and the formation of the morula. The male gamete (sperm) and the female gamete (egg) fuse to form a zygote. The zygote then undergoes cleavage to form a morula. The morula is composed of cells that are arranged in a spherical pattern. The morula is then implanted in the uterine wall, where it will develop into an embryo.
