Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of molecular motion slowly decreases. Molecules that are bonded remain close to the other bonded particles, leaving the unbonded molecules at the front of the line and they move from the leading to the trailing end of the line. The former unbonded molecules are particles that are free to move and thus have the power of the leading or primary component of the line. The free particles are the ones who interact and are being moved toward the end of the line by the molecules that are bonded to the particles at the front of the line. The molecules that are bonded to the particles at the front of the line are the primary component of the line. The molecules that are bonded to the particles at the front of the line are the primary component of the line. The molecules that are bonded to the particles at the front of the line are the primary component of the line.
