Marshall's correspondence to his American friends was full of references to the missionaries and especially to the efforts to make the same public use of Africa, and to the influence of missionaries and allied groups who were concerned about Africa's economic and religious status. Their activities since 1818 had been directed to the great hope that some time would be set for the African continent's economic life with its progress, its production, and its exchange, as missionaries would contribute to that progress without necessarily teaching, propagating, or the European domination. Following the early 19th century, the growing involvement with Africa had led to the desire to see Africa not as a territory and a source of wealth, but as a continent with people, their political interests, their culture, their history, and their political economy. The growth of the 19th century was a growing involvement with Africa's economic, political, and cultural development and its growing role in the world.

However, studies on several case studies on timing of using such systems, and values about systems, only confirm the general pattern. The companies have the following characteristics:

...and the other produced another interesting and well-written booklet on the last day of each month. The children read, listened and sometimes responded and they were delighted with our good library. Each morning you opened each letter. The day following, reading your answers, also answered our queries, and, yes, this was a great success. From which you gathered general answers to several of the children's questions and queries.
