Abstract: This paper reports the results of a survey of 1000 people in the United States about their beliefs and attitudes concerning the environment. The survey was conducted by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) in 1990. The results show that most people believe that the environment is being harmed by human activities, and that the government should take action to protect it. They also believe that individuals should take responsibility for protecting the environment. The survey also found that people are concerned about global warming, ozone depletion, and other environmental issues. The results of this survey are consistent with other research that shows that Americans are generally concerned about the environment and support government action to protect it.
