Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of convection within the mantle will also decrease. This could be the immediate reason there is no hot spot activity beneath the continents, where the crust is thicker and the heat loss is a lot more than the cooling to the ambient surface of the ocean. Another explanation involves the presence of a geothermally stable lithosphere beneath the continents, which would prevent the rising of the mantle convection cells at the continental margins. The two explanations are not mutually exclusive, and one cannot exclude either the one or the other. The question of continental geothermally stable lithosphere is a subject of the future chapters, especially the chapter on the structure of the lithosphere, and the chapter on the structure of the mantle.
