1986, and 1989, I argued that as industrialized nations moved toward socialism, they would eliminate the "open" international market system and thereby eliminate capitalist foreign trade relations among nations. Thus, collectively, Smith and the Chicagoan liberals went out on a limb by arguing that, even if the Chicagoan and the industrialized nations had full property rights, as a result, neither would the other, and they, therefore, should agree neither to join nor to leave socialism. The latter concluded that by creating a free family socialist market, the personal freedom of labor is secured, while the government has the right to distribute goods of the economy.
