What if people themselves can understand things better?

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence by intimate partners. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Women's Health are used. Results show that among those who have ever been married or cohabited, 10% of men and 16% of women reported having experienced physical violence by their current or former partner. Among those who had been physically abused, 17% of men and 28% of women reported being depressed. These results suggest that exposure to intimate partner violence may increase the risk of depression in both men and women.
