For economic reasons, grocery stores flock to high-income areas, rather than low-income areas. As the wealthy have moved from cities to suburbs in recent decades, major retailers, including supermarkets, have followed. As a result, low-income populations remaining in the cities have fewer choices in where they shop for food. In 1995, researchers at the University of Connecticut conducted a study of 21 major metropolitan areas nationwide. They found that there were "a third as many supermarkets in low-income areas compared with high-income areas." For the poor, this can make finding food, especially healthy food, very difficult. Their choices are reduced to either paying higher prices for unhealthy food at convenience stores, or traveling a significant distance to the cheaper supermarkets, where many times healthy food is still out of their price range. If they lack transportation, even this option is unavailable to them.

Poor people in rural areas likewise suffer from a lack of access to affordable healthy food. A study conducted by Phil R. Kaufman, an agricultural economist, found that the low-income households in rural areas rely on small grocery stores, and therefore face higher average food prices and reduced access to food.

To the extent that low-income people do have access to healthy food, they often can't afford it. As a result, they rely on less-expensive unhealthy foods which cause diseases such as diabetes and obesity. Adam Drewnowski, a University of Washington professor who studies obesity and social class, found in a study "that a calorie-dense diet cost $3.52 a day compared with $36.32 a day for a low-calorie diet" (Drewnowski
