Antimicrobial stewardship programs (ASPs) are established means for institutions to improve patient outcomes while reducing the emergence of resistant bacteria. With the increased adoption and evolution of electronic medical records (EMRs), there is a need to assimilate the tools of ASPs into EMRs, using decision support and feedback. Third-party software vendors provide the mainstay for integration of individual institutional EMR and ASP efforts. Epic is the leading implementer of EMR technology in the United States. A collaboration of physicians and pharmacists are working closely with Epic to provide a more comprehensive platform of ASP tools that may be institutionally individualized. We review the historical relationship between ASPs and the EMR, cite examples of Epic stewardship tools from 3 academic medical centers' ASPs, discuss limitations of these Epic tools, and conclude with the current process in evolution to integrate ASP tools and decision support capacities directly into Epic's EMR.

Keywords. Epic; electronic medical records; technology; antimicrobial stewardship.

Antimicrobial resistance has been recognized by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the World Health Organization as both a “major public health issue” and “one of the three greatest threats to human health” [1]. In fact, the theme of World Health Day 2011 was “antimicrobial resistance: no action today and no cure tomorrow,” emphasizing not only the concern for resistance, but also the worrisome aspect of few novel antibiotics in the development pipeline [2]. Now, in the 21st century, we are faced with bacterial infections for which no treatment exists.

In response to this significant problem to society, antimicrobial stewardship programs (ASPs) have been implemented worldwide, with the Infectious Diseases Society of America and Society for Healthcare Epidemiology of America (IDSA/SHEA) guidelines for developing ASPs recommending that healthcare institutions invest in data systems that are capable of measuring quality improvement from antimicrobial stewardship implementation [3]. Effective programs have improved patient outcomes and decreased antibiotic usage by up to 35%, with an annual savings to institutions of up to $900 000 [4–10]. Due to these substantial findings, in 2010 the California Department of Public Health Healthcare Associated Infections Program developed the only statewide ASP initiative mandating general acute care hospitals to monitor and evaluate the utilization of antimicrobials [11].

For ASPs to be optimized fully and truly make a viable long-term impact on patient outcomes, information technology (IT) must be employed. Electronic medical records (EMRs), online referral and prescription systems, and computerized provider order entry have been relied on heavily in all aspects of healthcare, including antimicrobial stewardship.
