| As an old woman, Rukmani often imagines that her deceased husband, Nathan , appears to her in her sleep, and they pass the night peacefully together. In the morning, he always vanishes.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |               |  |  |  |  |               |

Anyway, Rukmani knows it's useless to question her decisions: "what's done is done." Puli's hands have been destroyed by leprosy, but the local doctor, Kenny , and Rukmani's son Selvam have prevented the disease from spreading to Puli's limbs. |               |  |  |  |  |               |
